Notice: April Meeting is Cancelled

50th Anniversary of Earth Day April 22nd

Earth Day is a world-wide event to educate ourselves about our world and our environment. The theme for this year is "Climate Action". Locally, our usual education display at the CDA Public Library has been cancelled, as are many other planned events. What can we do while we shelter in place? Go to www.earthday.org to educate ourselves on the issues, plant a tree in our yard, or take part in a citizen science project such as nest watch are a few ideas. Take care - Stay healthy - Shirley

President's Message

What's that old wise saying - "If you want to make God laugh, make a plan". Well, as I write this in the middle of March, all of our plans are on hold. Most of the events that Antje and I have scheduled for the next couple of weeks have been cancelled. We're waiting to decide if we want to risk traveling to Bend to visit our son, daughter-in-law, and grandchildren and bring risk to them and to us. So, what to do.

The Audubon Board will be considering whether to cancel the next two general meetings. As I understand, we'll all know a lot more in the next 6-8 weeks what this pandemic is going to look like in North Idaho. But, I fear that this season of Audubon birding is going to be different than any other year.

I've just cancelled a birding trip to the CdA River for the second weekend because of bad weather which is a shame because I was out there a couple of days ago and there are a huge, HUGE, number of waterfowl in the flooded fields. Also, there were many v-g swallows flying over the flooded fields. So, I hope many of you were able to get out there on a decent day to see them. And the other migratory species will start showing up soon.

It looks like we might get a resolution on a project that we've been struggling with for nearly two years, a public memorial to Kris Buckler. State Park officials have indicated they would be fine with putting up a sign, or signs, at Farragut and Heyburn State Parks. Also, City Parks and Rec has finally responded regarding a proposed hiking trail in the hill above Fernan Lake. We don't know how quickly they will be willing to move. But we hope to have signs at Farragut and/or Heyburn before long.

In the meantime, keep calm and carry on - and wash your hands.

Birds Can Be Beacons of Hope

A Message from Cornell Lab of Ornithology

March is normally the month when my wife Molly and I head to central Florida where, every year since 1972, I have studied Florida Scrub-Jays. Things are quite different this year, with the entire world hunkering down for an extended fight against the spread of COVID-19.

Even though I'm sticking close to home for now, I am comforted to know the scrub-jays are there, pairing up under the bright Florida sun, lining new nests with palmetto fibers, unperturbed by the tremendous human ordeal around them.

I often talk about the power of birds, but this year they take on an even more powerful meaning. They enliven our days, brighten the trees, serenade in our backyards and city parks, and bestow us with so much joy and hope, all bundled together in feathers and lively personalities.

Like everyone around the world, we at the Cornell Lab are adjusting to new routines. We've also spent recent days scouring our brains and our servers for ways to help—in some small way—people who find their daily lives upended.

If you're a teacher prepping for a new kind of remote class, we'll send you ideas. A parent or grandparent whose kids are on an unexpected "spring vacation"? They can play our games and learn. Are you a bird watcher with extra time on your hands—or an inveterate traveler now homebound? We can bring birds and bird song into your home—or let you explore the farthest reaches of the world in sounds and images.

A core part of our mission is to help people celebrate the wonder of birds. We do it because you (and we) love birds, are amazed by their powers, and even gain solace from them and a deep, clean breath of hope.

Together we'll all get through this. In the meantime, whenever you may need a moment of respite, we invite you to explore, enjoy, wonder, replenish, and spark hope with the resources we have to share. go to
